Buyology: Truth And Lies About Why We Buy

Synopsis

How much do we know about why we buy? What truly influences our decisions in today's message-cluttered world? An eye-grabbing advertisement, a catchy slogan, an infectious jingle? Or do our buying decisions take place below the surface, so deep within our subconscious minds, we're barely aware of them? In BUYOLOGY, Lindstrom, who was voted one of Time Magazine's most influential people of 2009, presents the astonishing findings from his groundbreaking, three-year, seven-million-dollar neuromarketing study, a cutting-edge experiment that peered inside the brains of 2,000 volunteers from all around the world as they encountered various ads, logos, commercials, brands, and products. His startling results shatter much of what we have long believed about what seduces our interest and drives us to buy. Among the questions he explores: Does sex actually sell? To what extent do people in skimpy clothing and suggestive poses persuade us to buy products? Despite government bans, does subliminal advertising still surround us - from bars to highway billboards to supermarket shelves? Can "Cool" brands, like iPods, trigger our mating instincts? Can other senses - smell, touch, and sound - be so powerful as to physically arouse us when we see a product? Do companies copy from the world of religion and create rituals - like drinking a Corona with a lime - to capture our hard-earned dollars? Filled with entertaining inside stories about how we respond to such well-known brands as Marlboro, Nokia, Calvin Klein, Ford, and American Idol, BUYOLOGY is a fascinating and shocking journey into the mind of today's consumer that will captivate anyone who's been seduced or turned off by marketers' relentless attempts to win our loyalty, our money, and our minds.

Through extensive and expensive research, Lindstrom provides an adequate primer on what neuroscience studies can tell society—particularly marketers—about how selling (and more important, buying) works. Whether considering the roles of sex, religion, product placement or contradictions in consumer habits between what they say and what they do, Lindstrom explores how brain-scan studies reveal an avalanche of information about what works and what doesn't. Though the information is intriguing, Lindstrom's disregard for the potential abuses of such information (such as marketers purposely manipulating people to buy products that are harmful, of which there is a proven track record) makes his enthusiasm suspect. Don Leslie provides a good voice for nonfiction material, using a congenial tone with good emphasis to keep the listeners engaged. His gentle but deep voice creates the impression of an older person imparting knowledge upon the youth, which may also lend some authority to the text. A Doubleday hardcover. (Oct.) Challenging, exciting, provocative, clever, and, even more importantly, useful!"-Andrew Robertson, CEO & President, BBDO Worldwide Lindstrom can be a charming writer. He has an encyclopedic knowledge of advertising history and an abundance of real-world business experience From the Hardcover edition.

It does, in a way, advertise other companies like some comments have said but the book in itself is attention grabbing. He talks about the experiments and the results and how companies try to market to the consumer in a variety of ways. It is interesting because it offers a new perspective on how you are being manipulated as a consumer. Do not expect this book to teach you how to run a business or to give you an in depth analysis of what each company does and what each product/ad attempts to do to you. If you want thorough analysis to teach you every trick there is, I suggest for you to search a new book. If you want some overall knowledge and idea this is the book!

I liked and enjoyed Buyology. I do not understand so much negative feedback other than it seems many people expected it to be more (or less!) of something. It is a storytelling of marketing. What it is not is a scholarly research paper. It is a primer for the rest of us that either spend money impulsively and would like to do less of that, or are concerned about someone that spends money impulsively and you would like him/her to do less of that. It doesn't even have to be money; the same impulses to spend are also the impulses to compel any habit. Critics point out that the essential science is brief and could be published in one to five pages. For sure; but a pamphlet containing essential science is not likely to be picked up by very many people. You can get that stuff in the doctor's office. Critics point out that the writer is egotistical. Really? You don't say! Of course a marketer is egotistical. He or she must believe in self and the product. So, with that out of the way, on with the book report: Who do you know that wastes money buying the same thing over and over and over because it is and so on. Speak to the instincts. Marketers take advantage of your basic instincts which can be summed up more or less as food, sex and reproduction, shelter and safety. This part of the brain neither listens to words nor speaks words. That is where the fMRI detector comes in. It can see what your inner brain is doing much better than you can, but it should not be such a mystery. You cannot just choose to be fearless of high places or to be untempted by sex. You can to a limited degree override your fear or resist your temptations, but it is a lot of work and marketers believe you will spend money rather than expending the effort to override your instincts which they have triggered. Politicians and religious leaders use the same tactics of course.

Loved the read. I learned quite a bit about the current use of fMRI in pricing/buying psychology. One strike against the book would be that Martin could have spoke about more experiments. There was an awful lot of lead-up and conclusion to each study discussed and honestly not much discussion about the study. Some time is spent on the psychology of buying and pricing - I think Martin is very knowledgeable on the subject. That is useful and worth reading the book to learn.

As advertised. Happy with purchase.

Finally, a book that answers my questions about why the heck people spend so much money on popular brands with crappy products. Very insightful read!

Well written and well researched, the author reveals the technical reasons on how we make buying decisions. It explores the science of the brain. And picks apart the techniques that marketers use to convince people to pick up the phone or drop it into the basket. Having read many similar books including the series that Malcolm Gladwell wrote, I'd highly recommend this book. You might even adding Brandwashed, Martin Lindstrom's second book on the subject.

Despite poppish presentation and Bill Nye science, I found the whole thing pretty interesting--the idea that product presentation could hit us subconsciously in sectors of the brain and influence purchasing behavior. Then I read some of the articulate and apparently learned very negative reviews and I have to admit it made me feel sophomoric. But geez, guys . . . Lighten up. Aren't the various ideas presented in the book at least worthy of consideration? How about to neophytes like me who haven't the foggiest clue about this stuff. I mean, was it really that bad?

Great book about shopping and marketing with good research based insights. We (customers) are not always as rational as we would like to think.
